Section A: Research Methods

- 1 Positivists prefer to use a scientific approach when studying society. They aim to gather data which they believe will help them uncover trends in society. Sociologists who favour the interactionist perspective prefer to gather qualitative data. Interactionists believe that this data is rich in insights into the reasons and motives that explain social actions.

The sociologist's theoretical perspective is usually the most important influence on their choice of research method. Once a research method has been chosen, it will be necessary to decide who will be included in the study group. There are a number of ways of selecting a sample group to study. These include random, stratified and cluster sampling.

The sampling process helps keep research projects at a manageable level. The sampling process may also influence the research method by which the data is collected. Provided that the sample is carefully chosen the results can be said to apply to a much larger population.

The evidence collected directly by a sociologist is known as primary data. Secondary data may also be used in sociological research. Historical documents are an example of secondary data.
