Question 2

Pre-Mughal Bengal

Pataliputra

The remains of a once great city

The earliest phase of the history of Bengal is not well known. There is little written evidence left, meaning that information has had to be gathered from a wide variety of documents and pieced together.

Some structures are known to have existed by the fourth century. Land was thought to have been divided into six main areas of settlement. There were centres of trade and commerce. There were capital cities such as Pundranagara. 5

Links to the wider world are known to have been created in the Mauryan era. Buddhism arrived in Bengal and was carried to Sri Lanka by Bengal's leader.

By the era of the Guptas, a powerful kingdom of Bengal, based on a well-developed market town on the banks of the River Ganges, is known to have been able to trade with China and even further afield. 10

Question 3

The Mughal Period

The Shalimar Gardens

The Consolidation of the Mughal Empire

Sher Khan, better known as Sher Shah, established Afghan rule in Bengal and threatened the Mughal Empire. It was not until the death of Sher Shah in 1545 that the Mughals could regain the empire from the Afghans. When Akbar became Emperor he had to fight to consolidate his empire in both the north and south of India. He was not able to take control of Bengal until 1576.

However, conflict with local zamindars of Bengal, known as the Baro Bhuiyans, meant that his period of rule remained a period of war. It was only under Islam Khan, sent by Jahangir to be Governor of Bengal, that the conflict finally ended.

The outcome was that Shah Jahan, son of Jahangir, was able to establish a period of peace where there was control of the borders and arts and trade could prosper.

Question 4*The British Period*Lord Cornwallis*The Impact of the Great Famine

The East India Company (EIC) developed British interests in India. However, the impact of the Great Famine between 1769 and 1770 was so severe that the British Government was forced to interfere in the EIC's business. Following a period of Dual Administration, the British Government took direct control of its Indian possessions. There was to be a Governor-General, provincial Governors and a Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces.

Land ownership rules were changed by law. Zamindars, subject to meeting British requirements, were made permanent owners of the land. While this system created an aristocracy loyal to the government, it failed to improve farming.

British rule did not show clear understanding of how society in India worked. Britain neither understood the relationship between zamindars and farmers, nor the role played by alms in religious practice.
