Alain and his wife lived in a pleasant town near Paris. They liked being free to go out together because their children had left home. Last week, they were invited to a reception at the office where he worked.

They set out at seven o'clock and stopped in front of the building half an hour later. During the evening, they ate and also they talked to a lot of Alain's friends. Monsieur Duvallier, the director, was a charming man who introduced them to several employees whom they had not yet met.

Towards midnight, they were feeling very tired so they decided to return home. Alain had only drunk mineral water and he was able to drive without any problem, but his wife soon fell asleep. On arriving, they went to bed immediately.

At five o'clock, the telephone rang and woke up Alain who was, of course, still exhausted. It was their daughter who wanted to catch a plane early in the morning as she was going on holiday with her friends at the university.

"I'm sorry, Dad!" she explained, "but I've missed my train, there aren't any taxis and I must be at the airport before eight o'clock. Can you take me by car?" Unfortunately, Alain had to get up in order to help his daughter. He was not at all pleased.
