He wondered if he should make tea for himself and his parents. But from their room he had heard no movement, no sound of voices, although it was nearly nine o'clock. Perhaps they were still asleep.

Not knowing what to do, he sat down on a chair. It was Sunday morning; everything was quiet. He looked around the humble room. On the wall hung a little painting representing a cottage shaded by a large tree. It was part of the familiar furniture, so to speak, and he had never troubled to look at it closely before.

Memories of childhood came back to his mind. He remembered the time when his mother was a pretty, rosy-cheeked young woman. When he was about ten, he had been tortured by the thought that one day she would grow old and die. But almost without noticing it, time had gone by and now his parents were old, and sick and tired of living. They didn't get up early because they had nothing to do. Life offered them no more pleasure, no more hope.
